McCarthy's wise, dubious, existential edge reflects on the deepest American themes of regeneration through violence, particularly the roles of men in the creation of our inescapable national identity. His stories ask readers whether a country so created out of blood and greed can ever redeem itself.

Kenneth Lincoln's Cormac McCarthy: American Canticles complements this by reflecting on Woodward's cross-country journey with McCarthy, remarking that their trip consisted of Woodward riding shotgun alongside McCarthy "across the Texas-Mexican desert in a Ford pickup, slumming through El Paso pool halls and stopping in local diners." McCarthy's "gregarious loner" persona informs the semi-autobiographical character of
